INTERESTING APPLES.

Varieties of Large Size Forming a Succession. The interesting trio of western New York apples here mentioned form a succession both in season and in quality. The two varieties shown are described by American Agriculturist as being noted for their large size. In the basket at the top is Alexander, which ripens through most of September and October. It is a remarkably showy red streaked variety of poor to medium quality, with the further faults of rotting, cracking and dropping. Another large red apple also described is Twenty Ounce, which ripens during

THE ALEXANDER AND HUBBARDSON. October, but may be kept in good ordinary storage til. Christmas and in cold storage till midwinter. It is an exceptionally large, red streaked apple of good to better cuality, useful for both market and house use. The fruit hangs fairly well, considering its size, and is generally satisfactory. The lower ap ple shown in the cut is Hubbardson, later than Twenty Ounce and of even finer quality. It is distinctly a dessert variety, in special favor during late November, December and early January. Very prolific, showy and uniform, it has become a leading sort in western New York and well deserves its popularity both at home and in foreign markets.

Alfalfa Nills Kept Busy.

Alfalfa meal, though only a very short time on the market, has already become an appreciated feeding stuff, according to the Breeder's Gazette, Chicago, which says: Its chief handicap has been its relative cost, but despite that it has attained such wide use that every alfalfa mill in the country has been pushed to its utmost capacity for some time. This in a measure accounts for the phenomenal demand which has existed for months for well cured pea green third and fourth cutting his of this sort. Prediction among the best informed men in the hay trade is that the demand for good alfalfa hay is just starting and that the product of the thousands of acres of new seeding laid down each successive year will attain a ready sale. The main rouble, it is alleged, is that so far no machine has yet been invented for the sole purpose of grinding alfalfa. However, inventive genius is at work on the problem, and it is to be presumed that before very long an alfalfa mill will be perfected that will materially lessen the cost of grinding. It is predicted that when this happens milling alfalfa will be one of the largest industries and equal to the flour milling business row.

For the third time Marian Macres ose from the uncomfortable settee that faced the complaint desk and approach ed the young woman, seated behind the wide window, who was talking to the checker. "Of course It gave her a good chance to let us all know what nice white arms she has, but my mother 'd see me in my grave before she'd let me go to a bah in any such costume as that." "Will you kindly ascertain whether they have found my parcel yet?" intercupted Marian, tapping the desk lightly with the tips of her gloved fingers. The young person flung her an impatient look.

"What parcel?" "The one about which I inquired as intervals for the past half hour." "What's your name and what's wrong with the bundle?" inquired the girl in bored tones.

"You took my name twice and tele phoned the delivery department, and I am waiting for their report. Why do you not call them again and see wheth er the parcel has been located?" "Say, do you think I want to get the delivery boys down on me? If they find it, they'll tell me quick enough"-"If"- echoed Marian, her delicate face flushing under the girl's cool impertinence.

"Well, I'll take your name and address and drop you a postal when we find it."

"Indeed, you will not. I want it now," said Marian, and she walked away from the window, with head high and nostrils quivering.

"Wonder if she's going down into the subcellar to get it," giggled the young person to the checker. "It is funny how some swells think they can come in here and run this store. I guess she doesn't know we've got a system here."

Then while the girl continued her account of the fancy dress ball Marian crossed to the main aisle, found a floorwalker and asked to be directed to the superintendent of employees. Five minutes later she was ushered into the presence of a smooth faced, square shouldered chap who looked as if he had received his training on the football gridiron rather than as stock boy in a big department store.

Richard Burnside had risen from the lowest ranks in the store where he was now superintendent, studying practical business methods by day and physical culture and English branches at the Y. M. C. A. rooms by night. Now he stood beside his desk, Marian Macrea's card bent between his fingers. He looked the slender, graceful figure over with the keen eye of a man accustomed to seeking good material for his staff and decided that she must be a reporter or magazine writer tion of the working girl. He had met many such since he had become superintendent. "What can we do for you, Miss Macrae?" he inquired, offering her a seat. "I merely called to ask you whether your complaint department had been organized for the convenience of your customers or to browbeat them so effectually that they will endure almost any inconvenience rather than make hunting information about the condicomplaint?" Richard Burnside sat down rather suddenly. This was not just what he had expected. Very deliberately, but convincingly, Marian told her story, from the indifference of the clerk who had first waited on her to the impertinence of the young woman at the complaint desk. When she had finished, Burnside leaned forward, his hands clasped between his knees, his face bovish no longer, but seamed deeply with lines of anxiety. "Miss Macrea, you have been treated outrageously, and so have many of our customers, and I, the superinetndent of this store, cannot find a remedy, because I cannot handle women employees. I can handle the boys in this line, because I know boys, but the indifferent, the insolent woman employee

's beyond me." He glanced up to meet Marian's sympathetic glance. Impulsively he told per of his humble beginning, the pride with which he had accepted his new work and his many vexations and trials with incompetent help. "I have had five girls at that complaint desk, each less satisfactory than the one before her. If I could just find a girl with judgment, discretion and good manners-but you can't expect to find such a girl for $12 a week, can you?" His big gray eyes were lifted to Marian's brown ones.

laugh that seemed to fairly bubble up from her slender white throat. "Do you think I would fill the bill? I would like to earn $12 a week." "You?" gasped Burnside, his glance

She laughed, a queer, chuckling little traveling from her neat boots to her trim tailored hat. "Why, yes. When I came in here I never thought of such a thing, though I have been wanting a position of some sort. I believe I would know whether a woman had a just complaint or was trying to cheat the firm, and I have always been complimented on my tact. I know I have patience. because I have been-companion to an invalid for several years. If you would consider the proposition, I can furnish references." "I don't give a fig for references. You're engaged. Can you begin Monday? I'll put that girl back where she belongs-in the mail order department. And that was how Marian Macrea walked out of the Barnes Bros.' store with a job in her pocket and an odd little smile playing around her lips.

Three months passed. Burnside was no longer worried about the conduct or the complaint department. In fact, he argued that the reason he dropped in to talk complaints over with its presiding head was merely as a relief after other worries. It was a pleasure to see a department run so smoothly And all over the big store the same atmosphere was beginning to assert itself. There were weekly talks to the women clerks, at which reports from floorwalkers and complaining customers were offered; little lectures on the smoothing out of tangles and the adjustment of differences were given. The sales girls took a new view of selling goods and handling customers. and none knew that these talks were all planned out in a charming little uptown apartment, where the superintendent and the head of the complaint department gravely discussed store problems while the invalid mother forgot her own pains in listening to the new interests of her daughter.

Then came the great day when James Barnes, Sr., returned from his trip around the world. Richard Burnside had no need to give account of his stewardship. Others had done so in letters that encircled the globe, and so one bright spring morning the head of the house sat in his superintendent's office saying the sort of things that warm an employee's heart when there came a tap at the door, and a girl with soft brown hair and eyes entered the office, her hands filled with report

"Mr. Barnes, I want you to know Miss Macrea, the very capable"-But Mr. Barnes, quite apoplectic, was sparring for wind. "Marian, what in the world! If you wanted something to do, why didn't you go in for settlement work?" Richard Burnside felt the little office spinning around as Marian crossed the room and patted the apoplectic forehead soothingly with her slender white hand. "Dear Uncle Jimmy, do not have a stroke. With the head of the firm globe trotting and ever thing mother and I had in the world in this store, I felt I had a right to come in here and see that our small investment was Howard to do it when one has a new motor and the other a new yacht." Ten minutes later Marian laid her reports on Burnside's desk and turned to leave. He held the door open for her, and as she flung him a cheery smile she stopped suddenly. His face looked old. His eyes were heavy, as if they had watched something very lovely and dear pass out of his life. She paused irresolutely and glanced over her shoulder. Mr. Barnes, Sr., was just passing through the opposite door-safe. You couldn't expect Jimmy or way into the mall order department. "You will be up tonight, as usual? I want to talk over the question of a new rest room for the girls." Richard Burnside's face went a shade paler, and he spoke in a voice he had never used to her before. "Certainly, if you wish it." "Of course I wish it." She tried to speak gayly, but her voice trembled. "Don't you understand? I want everything to go on just as it has before. Oh, why do you make it so hard for me?" His face was still stern, but she persisted. "I-I want you to tell me-what-what I would not let you say the other night-because now 1 know it was all for myself-don't you understand?" She passed out like a flash and drew the door shut behind her. Richard Burnside leaned heavily against it, breathing hard, but the light of youth had come back to his eyes.

Making Things Clear. An old Peebles worthy and an English lady were one day recently occu pants of a railway carriage in an Edinburgh bound train. The train had been waiting long at a certain station, and there was no appearance of its starting, when the worthy remarked, "They are a gey taiglesome lot here." "I beg your pardon," said the lady. "I'm sayin' they're an awfu' daidlin squad here," said the old fellow. "I really beg your pardon, sir," she rejoined.
